Membrane transport

Diffusion is the net movement of particles from higher to lower concentration. It does not require cellular energy. Active transport moves substances against a concentration gradient and requires energy. A selectively permeable membrane allows some substances to pass more readily than others.

Original sample notes written for the PDFtoDeck study guide.